ش

A. ش shîn. The sixteenth letter of the Turkish and Persian and thirteenth of the Arabic alphabet. Its full name is شین معجمه (the dotted ش*)*. It is also called شین قرشت (the shin of the word قرشت — of the ابجد formula). Its phonetic value is sh, as in ship. Its numerical value in chronograms is 300. When reduplicated or when followed by ح or ه, it must be carefully pronounced and transliterated; as, عشار 'âsh-shâr, رشحه rèsh-h, رشحه rèsh-hâ.

ش is one of the letters reduplicated in pronunciation instead of the ل of the Arabic article ال; as, قرص الشمس qûrsû'sh-shèms.

In writing, it can be joined to letters preceding or following it. As with the letter س the dentations of the ش are sometimes dispensed with.

Suffixed to the root-word of any Turkish verb and preceded by a formative esere vowel, the letter ش forms a noun of manner which is sometimes taken as a simple noun of action; as, باق (look thou), باقش (a manner or kind of look or looking).

Suffixed to the root-word of any primitive affirmative verb, and preceded by the formative esere vowel when the root ends with a quiescent consonant, the letter ش is used to form a new verb-root that commonly implies reciprocal action. But sometimes this form is used when the actor is but one, and then each part of that actor is conceived as a concurrent actor throughout the parts and the whole. Thus: باقق (to look), باقشمق (to look at one another, or, to look concurrently at something); سويلمك (to speak), سويلشمك (to speak together or with one another). Sometimes, again, this form of the verb expresses an action that is repeated or continued and distributed by one actor, or by several actors, over the parts of the object: thus: آرامق (to seek for), اراشمق (to seek a thing in many places, to examine every place for it)

In Persian the letter ش is used to form a noun of action, of which certain ones are used in Turkish literature; as, آفرينش (creation), سوزش (a burning), etc.

In the dates of letters and documents the letter ش, deprived of its dots, represents the month of شعبان

ص

A. ص sâd. The seventeenth letter of the Turkish and Persian, and fourteenth of the Arabic alphabet. Its full name is صاد مهمله The undotted ص; it is also called صاد سعفص The ص of the word صعفص (in the ابجد formula). Its phonetic value is that of s in sorrow.

Being one of the hard consonants, it is always pronounced with one of the hard vowels when movent, and it affects even the preceding vowel in a word, making it hard when it would, otherwise, have been soft.

The letter ص is reduplicated in pronunciation, when it immediately follows the Arabic definite article ال.

When followed by ح, or ه, care should be taken to avoid combining the pronunciation of the two letters into the sound of the English sh. Each should have its full value, thus, اصحاب âs-hâb. تصحیح tâs-hîh.

The numerical value of ص is 90.

Many Turkish words now written with ص are found in some authors written with س. Hence Turkish words found written with س may occur in this Lexicon written with ص.

When an Arabic triliteral root begins with ص and passes to the eighth form (افتعال), the servile ت of the form is changed into ط; thus صلح, اصطلاح, مصطلحات; صبر, اصطبار, etc.

In dates of letters and documents it stands for the month صفر. سورهٔ ص The chapter of the letter ص, the thirty-eighth chapter of the Qur'an.

A. ض dād. The eighteenth letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets, and fifteenth of the Arabic. Its phonetic value is, without any possible rule for the difference in Turkish, either a hard modification of the letter z, or a hard modification of the letter d. Students will pronounce it as an ordinary z or d. It is a hard consonant, and always followed by a hard vowel when movent. Its full name is ضاد مجمه, the dotted ض. It is also designated as ضاد ضظغ, the ض of the word ضظغ in the ابجد formula. Its numerical value is 800. It is one of the letters reduplicated in pronunciation instead of the ل of the Arabic definite article ال, when it follows this article as the initial of the noun.

It has no grammatical use in Turkish. In Arabic derivation, in the eighth form, when ض is the initial radical of a triliteral root, the servile letter ت is changed into ط; thus; ضجع, اضطجاع ; ضرر, اضطرار etc.

ط

A. ط tä, vulg. ti. The nineteenth letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets, and sixteenth of the Arabic. Its phonetic value in Arabic words and Persian compounds of them, and in some Turkish words, is that of a hard t. In other Turkish words it has the value of a hard d, but always has the value of t when found at the end of a word; also whenever it is followed by an èsèrè vowel it has the value of t. In words of foreign origin, ط is often used instead of ت. Europeans sometimes represent the ط by the combination th; but there is no valid reason for this.

The numerical value of this letter is 9. It is reduplicated in pronunciation when it follows the Arabic definite article آل, as: كتاب الطلاق kïtäbü 't-täläq.

In Arabic derivation, when the ط is the initial radical of a word, the servile ت of the eighth form is changed into ط, and the two letters ط thus resulting are combined into one, reduplicated in pronunciation; as; طلع, اطلاع ittilä', مطلع müttali'; طرد, اطراد ittirad, مطرد müttarid.

ظ

A. ظ zâ, vulg. zï. The twentieth letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets, and seventeenth of the Arabic. Its phonetic value is, according to Turkish pronunciation, that of a hard z. The full name of the letter is ظاء معجمه (the dotted ظ) and ظاء ضظغ (the ظ of the word ضظغ, in the ebjed formula)

The ظ is one of the letters reduplicated in pronunciation instead of the ل of the Arabic definite article ال, when it follows this article as the initial letter of a noun.

In Arabic derivation, the occurrence of ظ as the first radical of a triliteral root, such as ظلم, necessitates a modification of the servile ت of the eighth form (افتعال), which must then be changed into ط or ظ; if the servile ت be changed into ظ, this latter combines with the first radical ظ as a reduplicated letter; thus, instead of اظتلام iztilām, we have اظلام izzilām, for اظظلام; but if ط be used instead of the servile ت, we may either use the word اظطلام iztilām, or convert the radical ظ into a ط, and combine the two into one reduplicated ط; as, اطلام ittilām. This last is of a less frequent occurrence.

ع

A. ع 'àyn, Twenty-first letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets, and eighteenth of the Arabic. It does not enter into the orthography of any purely Persian or Turkish word. Its phonetic value in Arabic and in an Arab mouth, is a harsh guttural catch or hiatus. As pronounced by a Turkish scholar, the letter is either entirely silent, or the slightest hiatus is made sensible. But, though often silenced by the educated, and unknown to the vulgar, the letter ع has a solid consonantal value. It may be considered as the harsh hiatus; and, as such, may be paired off with the soft hiatus, (the hemze). In other words, ع may be considered a hard hemze. The place of an ع in a word, should always be marked in transliteration.

In this work we have adopted a reversed apostrophe (thus: ') to represent the ع in transliterations, distinguishing it from the sign which represents the hemze, by turning its head in the opposite direction.

As a harsh consonant, the ع should be always followed, when movent, by a hard vowel, but, as it is itself softened down in Turkish pronunciation, à, ì, and ù are occasionally used after it.

This letter has the numerical value of 70 in chronograms.

The full name of the letter is عين سعفص (the letter ع of the word sa'fas in the ebjed formula), and عين مهمله (the undotted ع).

In astronomical works the letter is used as an abbreviation for اجتماع (conjunction), and for تربيع (quadrature). In the margin of the Qur'an, it denotes the end of a section of ten verses, and before a quotation of poetry, it marks a hemistich (مصراع).

غ

A. غ gāyn, The twenty-second letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets the nineteenth of the Arabic. It has the numerical value of 1,000 in chronograms. Its phonetic value in Turkish is that of a guttural spirant, something like that of the French r grasséyé, but at the beginning of Arabic and Persian words its value as pronounced by Arabs, is often that of hard g. In Turkish words when it is not initial, it is generally softened down, even to the point of being inaudible. We have represented the softened sound of غ, as well as its guttural sound in this lexicon, by the English combination gh; and this must be sometimes softened in pronunciation. Thus; اغا ǡghǡ (almost ǡ-ǡ), اغاج ǡghǡj (almost ǡ-ǡj), يغمق yı̄ghmǡq (not at all like yı̄mǡq, the غ being here much more sensible, though not approaching to yı̄gmǡq). After a vowel و with the sound of o or u, the غ has very much the sound of w; like gh in throughout. Thus صوغان is pronounced sȯwān. From these remarks it will be seen that this letter is one of the peculiarities and niceties of the Turkish language, and calls for attentive study.

A Turkish grammatical function of the letter غ is to replace a final ق, when followed by a vowel, by the addition of a postposition or possessive pronoun. Thus; طوداق dudȧq, a lip; طوداغك dudȧghı̄n (almost dudȧ-ı̄n), of a lip, etc. So in some of the parts of verbs in مق; as, قيردق qı̄rdı̄q. قيردغم qı̄rdı̄ghı̄m, باقق bȧqmȧq; باقغه bȧqmȧghȧ. In a few monosyllabic Turkish words the final ق resists this grammatical degradation; as, آق ȧq. آقك ȧqı̄n, etc., but چوق chȯq. makes چوغك chȯghūn (almost chȯwūn), etc.

A. ق qȧf. The twenty-fourth letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets, and twenty-first of the Arabic. Its phonetic value is that of hard k.

The letter ق is the modern Semitic representative of the Phenician letter of the same name, adopted into Hebrew as ק. in the same place in the alphabet which it occupies in the ابجد formula as the first letter of the word قرشت, the four letters of the word standing in the same order in the Hebrew, in the archaic Greek, in the Latin, and in all complete modern European alphabets (q, r, s, t). For this historic reason, and also because the alphabets of Islam, like the Hebrew, distinguish severely between the hard letter ق and the soft letter ك, the transliteration of the present lexicon, in accordance with the judgment of the ripest scholars, represents the ق with q and the ك with its true historical equivalent k.

The letter ق exists in no original Persian word. But under the influence of the Arabic, a few Persian words are found sometimes written with ق, as their Arabicized form. A certain number of originally Turkish words, adopted of old into Persian, are also written with ق, convertible at times into غ or into ك. Under these varying forms, old original eastern Turkish words, have passed into modern Ottoman Turkish as Persian words, and are grammatically treated as such.

In Ottoman words of Turkish origin, the ق, as an initial of a word or syllable is always followed by a hard vowel, and in this case the letter never suffers any grammatical change.

Theoretically ق can never be medial in a syllable, in words of more syllables than one, it may be the final of a preceding syllable, or the initial of a following syllable; and in neither case is it liable to grammatical change. In words adopted from Arabic, it becomes a false medial sometimes in a syllable; that is, in reality, two Arabic syllables are fused into one; as, رقص rȧqs (Arabic rȧq-sun, etc.), وقت vȧqt (Arabic vȧq-tun, etc.).

As the final letter of a Turkish word of more than one syllable, the letter ق, under rules explained in the grammar, becomes changed into غ before vowels, thus: قازيغك, قازيق; طاوغك, طاوق; etc. If the word is Arabic, this rule does not apply; thus, توفيقك, توفيق, etc. In a Turkish monosyllable, a final ق remains unchanged sometimes, though not always; thus: اوق, اوقك; چوق, چوغك; etc.

ق has the numerical value of 100 in chronograms, etc.

سوره ق Name of the fiftieth chapter of the Qur'an.

ك

A. ك kyâf, kèf. The twenty-fifth letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets and twenty-second of the Arabic. In Turkish this letter has seven different phonetic values; namely, (1) that of the English k, as كسر kèsr, كسوت kìsvèt, etc., (2) that of hard g (unknown in Arabic); as, كرم gèrm, كل gìl, etc., (3) and (4) those of ky and gy (hard g), special to Turkish pronunciation when the kef is followed by a long vowel ا â, by a long و û, or by a short vowel u, ù; as كاتب kyâtìb, كار kyâr, كوب kyûb, كور gyûr, kyûr, gyùr, etc., (5) that of y (special to Turkish words, as a final or medial in a word); as اكمك èymèk, ايك ìy, etc., (6) that of ng (also special in Turkish words), generally softened into a simple n, or in the word صوكره sòñrà, sometimes omitted altogether, sòrà, and (7) that of w, when following a vowel u or ù; as, كوكرته gyûwèrtà, كوكرجين gyûwèrjìn; etc. Our method of transliteration for these different values, as shown above, is k, g, ky, gy, y, ñ, w. In its Arabic value, this letter is the original of the European k, as ق is the true source of the European q.

When a ك, with its Arabic value, is final in a Turkish Ottoman word that has to be modified by a possessive pronoun or a preposition preceded by a vowel sound, the ك undergoes no modification in writing, but its phonetic power changes from k to y: as, كوپك kyùpèk, كوپكم kyùpèyìm, كوپكه kyùpèyè, etc. If it, in such cases, be followed by a consonant, it suffers no change of phonetic value; as كوپكلری kyùpèklèrì, كوپكده kyùpèkdè, etc. Used with its other phonetic values, the final ك undergoes no change in such cases; as, سك sèg, سكم sègim, سكه sègè, etc.

The ك has several Turkish and one Persian grammatical use.

1. As nasal ñ, it marks the genitive definite.

2. Alone, it is the possessive adjective pronoun of the second person singular, and is suffixed to the noun possessed of a vowel. بابك bâbâñ, etc.

3. Alone, final, and quiescent, it forms the second person singular of all the past tenses of the conjugation of verbs, اوقودك oqudûñ, يوزدك yûzdûñ.

4. Joined to the root of the verb, with or without the addition of ز it forms the second person plural of the imperative; as, باق bâq, باقك bâqiñ or باقيكز bâqiñiz.

As a Persian letter, the Arabic ك forms the diminutive of nouns, and requires their final quiescent consonant to become movent with ustun; as, مرد mèrd, مردك mèrdèk; مردم mèrdûm, مردمك mèrdûmèk.

The ك has the numerical value of 20, in chronograms and in mathematical works.

The original name of the letter is كاف kyâf, vulg. kèf, but, to distinguish between the k and g powers of the letter in Persian and Turkish words, it is called كاف عربى kyâfi 'ârèbi, or كاف تازى kyâfi tâzi, when it has the former, and كاف فارسى kyâfi fârisi, or كاف عجمى kyâfi 'ajâmi, when it takes the latter value. It is also called صاغر كاف sâghir kèf, (surd ك), and even صاغر نون sâghir nûn, (surd ن), when it becomes nasal, or is pronounced as a simple n.
